

In order to atone for my sins and errors while living the criminal lifestyle, I want to accept full responsibility of my actions and admit that I was wrong from the beginning of my criminality, and I acknowledge that my conduct was detrimental to the lives of innocent people in society.

So today I beg for forgiveness from every American who must live in communities plagued with crime, drugs and violence. I am no longer affiliated with the criminal lifestyle, and I am profoundly apologetic that I once was.

There comes a time when doing nothing is selling out our children. When doing nothing is a direct breach of faith. When doing nothing is pulling a Judas. That time is now for us in relation to our children. The reality of these words is unquestionable but the duty to which they summon us is a very burdensome one. Even when forced by the orders of esoteric powers, we do not always easily accept the call to do what's morally right, especially when doing the right thing could create enemies from those doing wrong.

Over the past six-years, as I have moved towards doing the right thing, many persons have questioned the sincerity of my transformation. At the heart of their concerns these questions have frequently emerged vast and vociferous: "Why are you so eager to help the children? Aren't you a bad example for them?" And when I listen to them, though I usually understand the foundation of their concern, I am nonetheless deeply saddened, for such queries mean that the inquirers do not really know me, my dedication or my drive. Indeed, their questions suggest that they do not understand the circumstances that led to my demise.

In the luminosity of such unfortunate false impressions, I regard it of great significance to attempt to say emphatically that my Christian faith calls for me to love my neighbor as I love myself. Specifically, Jesus said, "Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me." Contrary to popular belief, my life's experience is a perfect that there is always hope after making bad decisions.

The crime, drugs and violence must cease. Something must be done now. As a contribution to the solution, I have written several books, protocols, manifestos and articles in hopes of reaching as many misguided minds as possible to inform them about the reality of the criminal lifestyle: death and incarceration.

I pray that you will find it in your heart to not only forgive me, but to work with me to help save our youth from premature death and incarceration.

I promise to spend the rest of my life securing a promising future for our children.

Sincerely,

Cedric Dean
